CURRENT PROJECTS

Women Leaders, COVID-19 and the Media

The socio-cultural impact of the COVID-19 pandemic has contributed to a weakening of the gendered division enforced between the private sphere of the home and the public sphere of politics that has traditionally disadvantaged women political leaders. This project will therefore provide a holistic and systematic analysis of the gendered ramifications of the pandemic through examining the media coverage of women leaders during this crisis. The main findings will be published in a GIWL-affiliated report and several peer-reviewed journal articles.

Media Sexism: How the press portray women prime ministers

A monograph adapted from my doctoral research, for proposal to Cambridge University Press. Combining a quantitative feminist content analysis with a qualitative feminist discourse and visual analyses of mainstream print media and use of gender tropes, this monograph will examine and compare the gendered mediation of women prime ministers from Australia, New Zealand and the United Kingdom.

News Corp and the 'Culture Wars'

The Murdoch press has long held political and cultural influence in Australia, in part due to its domination of national daily circulation and its monopoly in multiple states and capital cities. These papers have largely promoted conservative economic and social views that are hostile to women, particularly those who threaten the political status quo through ascending into the upper echelons of politics. In a series of publications, I will examine how he portrays both women politicians in addition to issues relating to feminism and LGBTQIA+ activism and communities to untangle how News Corp has fuelled the 'culture wars.'
